Not illustrated. 1869 Excerpt: .little touchinesses, little jealousies, and little pride--false notes, I say again, that jar the harmony! Would you realize this, O reader? Imagine the separation of death arisen between you and the too-familiar sharer of your home. What a flood of regrets you may thus detect, ready to brim and overflow your heart! The festal day recalled to mind That missed the gift that more endears; The word that might have been more kind, And now less fertile in vain tears: The little wrong, now greatly rued, That no repentance now can right. And it might be easier, one thinks, to be more gentle, more forbearing, more patient and generous, if that wide gulf of parting were oftener kept in mind and anticipated. Yet, after all, more love to God, more waiting and watching on Him, more self-denial and prayer, and diligent use of all the means of grace, --these are the dew which alone can keep our earths flowers fresh, and spare us the sad task, in Paradise, of reviving faded flowers. God alone knows the full melody: but it has been set to earth-music in the life of Christ. The more we copy that, and set ourselves to practise at that, the less imperfectly shall we produce the melody, the fewer jarring notes there will be. Oh, let us give up ourselves to learn of Him who had not where to lay His head, that heavenly and divine melody of Home, sweet home! Home, --the...
