Wheelock Craig was born in Augusta, Maine, July 11, 1824. His parents were Elias Craig and Eliza Wheelock. Eleazer Wheelock, founder of Dartmouth College, was his mother's grandfather. He is recalled by those who knew him in childhood, as a sage, quick-witted boy, having a large heart and an active brain, fond of books, ready in language, his thoughts and words always seeming to run in advance of his years. Everything he did was characterized by maturity and forwardness. His mind even then gave signs of that peculiar independent force which indicates one formed to be an originator and leader. He was not physically athletic, and entered with little zest into the ordinary sports of boyhood. Nature, however, from the first had a charm for him, and he delighted in the open air. He was fond of riding and was a tolerable horseman. Skating in Winter, and long rambles through the woods in Summer, were also favorite pastimes. He was always genial and companionable on the playground, and welcome there, even though he did not participate in the games. Study he took hold of with hearty enthusiasm; and there was evidently in him a strong susceptibility to the stimulating power of books. He developed while at school a decided gift for composition, both in prose and verse. Some of his rhymes, written at the age of twelve, are remarkable for their maturity of thought, as well as for their poetic accuracy and melody....
