Not illustrated. 1864 Excerpt: .before Gluckstadt to be very changeable, which can at last entirely close the entrance of the harbour. At the mouth of the Stor, the filling up with sand or mud would also be possible. If the harbour be erected more to the North-east, probably the sand would gradually follow, and so make the water entirely impassable. The building of the docks at Bremerhaven offer, in this respect, a good comparison to an apt selection in the choice of a harbour. In winter when the ice is breaking in the Elbe, ships would rather prefer taking a safe harbour near St. Margarethen, than expose themselves to all the dangers of the ice in winter. If there be a harbour at the BOSch, ships would be able at all times to enter this harbour, they could bring their cargoes to the Altona and Kiel Railway, if the Canal be kept clear of ice, and be in constant communication with Hamburg; for the plan of building a Railway along the banks of the Canal, to tow the ships is in contemplation. Hereby it would also come much into consideration to build a large basin in the middle of Holstein, at the place where the Canal intersects the Railway, and would, also in this extensive harbour, offer to ships the opportunity of transporting their cargoes from the Baltic to Hamburg and Germany, more conveniently by the Railway than by any other way. If 1800 ships, are presumed to pass the...
